Reflection on the Gospel

The Church's three year gospel cycle designated as A, B and C readings is so arranged that each of the synoptics, Matthew, Mark and Luke, teaches the community for a specific year. The current year 2009 in the B cycle has Mark as the designated teacher. His evangel, the shortest and the oldest of the gospel accounts, consists of only 16 brief chapters. The Passion account (that section dealing with the arrest, suffering and death of Jesus, which comprises about one fifth of the entire gospel) is characterized according to Donald Senior by three keywords: journey, the disbelief of the disciples and the cross as revelation and crisis.

In sharp contrast to Matthew and John, Mark pays more attention to the actions than the words of Jesus. And, probably writing soon after the destruction of the Temple and city of Jerusalem during the great Jewish War (AD 66-72), he shows little nostalgia "for what had been." Mark frames the Lord's teachings within the context of his journeying from Galilee, across the Jordan, through Jericho and ultimately "up to Jerusalem." Predicting not only his immediate passing but also the destruction of the very Temple itself, Jesus' death and glorification will soon supersede any sacrifices and ceremonials. The journey, therefore, becomes an important paradigm or setting for this stunning revelation. The second characteristic of disbelief of the disciples is emphasized in Mark's gospel. Their persistent misunderstanding and patent contradiction of Jesus' teachings are dramatically underlined. In the Garden on the night of His betrayal, they turn on their heels and flee, leaving their master in the hands of his enemies. In the court of the high priest during the trial and under the cross at the moment of death, Jesus is alone and abandoned. Every prediction of His suffering and death follows a pattern: patent contradiction and, in one instance, quarrels over places of honor in the messianic kingdom! Jesus then attempts to correct (without success) such self-serving impressions through the symbol of the cross. This shameful sign is revealed both in Christ's life-giving service to others and stands in open contradiction to all self-seeking or pretensions of power. As we prepare to enter into Holy Week, let us try to remember the figure of Jesus. Accompanied by vacillating disciples, a fickle crowd and the ever-ubiquitous enemies, the Jesus of Mark's gospel is truly the Man who can identify with the woes of all.

Study of the First Reading

These verses were part of the so-called "Songs of the Suffering Servant." Scholars have identified Isaiah 50:4-9 as a sliver of the Songs from this chapter. The sliver described the call of the Servant to preach, despite opposition. In the context of the times, Second Isaiah used these verses to address his critics among the exiles in Babylon. A general pessimism had descended upon Jewish populace in the city. When Second Isaiah saw promise in the coming reign of Cyrus, the Persian conqueror. Cyrus respected local religions and customs. Second Isaiah pinned his ambitions upon the Persian. Whether the prophet wrote before or after the conquest of Babylon in 539 B.C. has been an open question. No matter. Second Isaiah wrote to raise the hopes of the exiles and presented the possibility of return. Isaiah 50:4-7 spoke to the resistance the prophet may have felt. God called him to proclaim an unpopular message and the prophet would remain true to his call [50:4-5]. His critics would try to shame him. Indeed, the prophet would allow his opposition to shame him. But God would vindicate him [50:6-7]. Second Isaiah used one of the Servant Songs to refer to his own ministry. And he projected his message onto this unidentified leader (or group) who would bear the burden of leadership and judgment. Leadership made one open to criticism and to judgment. The Servant would face both as part of God's plan. As long as the Servant remained true to his call, he would stand with honor before God, not before men. No wonder early Christians adopted the image of the Suffering Servant and applied it to Jesus!
