Reflection on the Gospel

Deserts can be fearful places. An inhospitable climate; a variety of fauna such as serpents, spiders, lizards, disease-bearing flies, mosquitoes; and loneliness, all pose threats to survival. Yet, deserts can be as fascinating for us today as they were to ancient people who thought them to be the habitat of benevolent and malevolent spirits. Only beasts and gods can live alone in the desert, ran an old adage. Mark, the second evangelist, writing between the years AD 66 – 76, conveyed the theological concerns of his community in utilizing a variety of images and literary figures drawn from oral history, legend and popular apocalyptic works. When we read that the Spirit drove Jesus into the desert the implication is that the mission, the ministry of Jesus, was inaugurated not by personal or human whim but by the direct coercive action of the Holy Spirit. Once Jesus goes into the desert - used here as a synonym for the demesne of Satan (Hebrew for the adversary) - He experienced first hand the full enticing force of temptation. Indeed, was it hunger, a desire for power, or rash presumption of God's protection that posed the worst temptation? It seems that Matthew would relate all three in active collusion during this forty-day experience. Yet God willed that Jesus though tempted was to be abandoned there in the desert neither to His adversaries nor later during His earthly ministry in Israel. For the angels came to minister to Him was Mark's assurance that Jesus of Nazareth, first designated by the powers of darkness as the Holy One of God, had passed through His first trial and temptation. With this assurance He went on to His destined vocation vindicated by the power of the cross and resurrection.

Study of the First Reading

[9-11] Noah's covenant marks the second one God made with humanity. The first covenant God made with Adam. The first humans broke that alliance, sin increased in the world, and God turned nature against humanity. Noah's covenant was the result of the great flood. The flood itself was seen as a re-creation of the cosmos; the new covenant was God's re-alliance with humanity. Since Noah and his family were the only righteous people on earth, God promised Noah (as the representative of humanity) never to destroy humanity by a flood again. This covenant became the basis for the Jewish belief in the righteous Gentile, a non-Jew who honors the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. There are a few examples of these people in the New Testament. Since all people had a covenant relationship with God through Noah, all could be saved. Even nature was part of God's plan for salvation. [12-15] The sign of the rainbow. In the flood, the ancient people believed that it was not only a great rain, but that the heavens literally collapsed (and the ark became a submarine). As God re-created the world, the waters in the heavens and those on earth were re-separated by the appearance of dry land. The rainbow acts as a shield to keep the heavens from collapsing again. In this way the rainbow is not only a sign, but a physical barrier.

Study of the Second Reading

This short exercise in catechism logic should be so familiar it is laughable. Yet, many Christians do not swim through the depths of this insight. Jesus the Christ was all-powerful, even IN AND THROUGH DEATH. 3:18 described the Christ's death through a believer's eyes. As the innocent one, He died for us, the guilty, so He could reunite us with His Father. But, then, the verse stopped in His death and led up to 3:19, which described Jesus preaching the Good News to the lost souls in the place of the death (Sheol in Hebrew, not to be confused with hell, the realm of the damned). The author described these lost as those who were washed away in the Great Flood. [3:20] But, like many other verses in the New Testament, the author used an image or symbol in one analogy to turn to another. In this case, the water of the Flood (i.e., God's judgment) became the turning point to the analogy of Baptism. God used water as a vehicle to condemn the lost and save the few (Noah and his family; Christians). In fact, the water of Baptism gave Christians the only certain thing they possessed: a clear conscience based upon faith in the resurrection. Again, notice the source of clear conscience: Jesus Christ. For from death, Jesus rose to new life, thus revealing His power. Christ now exercises this power from a heavenly throne. Why would the author of 1 Peter reflect upon Christ's power in death (His "descent into hell" found in the Apostle's Creed) and through death (His resurrection)? He mused on this insight to answer another question. How far are we, as Christians, willing to go to follow Christ? This question was explicitly posed in 1 Peter 3:13. In the 3:8-12, the author discussed what a Christian lifestyle meant: taking the moral high road. In 3:14-17, the author praised those who suffered for the suffering they encountered living out their Christian commitment. Why? Because such suffering meant the believer walked the way of the Lord in a very real way. But, even in suffering and persecution, the Christian has power. For Christ had power in and through death. The way of the Cross is the path of suffering. But it is also the path of power.
